

Each year since 1994, the BYU International Center for Law and Religion Studies has hosted an International Law and Religion Symposium. To date, more than 850 leading experts from 113 countries have met together to discuss principles of religious liberty and to explore methods to better implement these principles worldwide.

Symposium participants have included leading religious leaders and educators, key scholars, human rights workers, judges from constitutional and supreme courts, and government leaders, including government ministers charged with handling religious affairs for their countries.

This year, the 18th International Law and Religion Symposium will bring together 75 delegates from 37 countries to discuss “Religious Freedom in a Pluralistic Age: Trends, Challenges and Practices,” in another memorable event.
