

Each year since 1994, the BYU International Center for Law and Religion Studies has hosted an International Law and Religion Symposium. To date, more than 1000 leading experts from more than 120 countries have met together to discuss principles of religious liberty and to explore methods to better implement these principles worldwide.

Symposium participants have included leading religious leaders and educators, key scholars, human rights workers, judges from constitutional and supreme courts, and government leaders, including government ministers charged with handling religious affairs for their countries.

This year, the 21th International Law and Religion Symposium brings together some 80 delegates from 40 countries to discuss “Varieties of Secularism, Religion, and the Law,” in what promises to be another memorable event.
